Arrival of the Ocean Queen.

HER TRIAL TRIP OF THE GREAT EASTERN.

THE QUESTION OF ITALY.

The United States Mail steamship Ocean Queen, Capt. Andrews, from Southampton on the 12th inst., arrived here last evening.

The advices are one day later than those received by the Arctic from Quebec. She also brings full files of London papers.

TRIAL TRIP OF THE GREAT EASTERN.

[From the London News.

It was [illegible] of the afternoon of the 8th before the engineers thought up to the bows, and the [illegible] pleased from restraint—and afterwards, she having to the Salmon-pole to direct her head round to the eastern [illegible] breakwater, the steam was turned [illegible] and the vessel, [illegible] finally out of the harbor—the weather [illegible] splendidly bright, the wind all but [illegible], and the sea as smooth almost as the [illegible] bridge. For some short time she continued eastward course, in order to gain sea-room [illegible] Portland Hill—but after steaming past [illegible] and far on towards Corfe, she tacked and [illegible] to sea in a northwesterly direction, working [illegible] gradually to the west, and passing the "Bill"

At this time the paddles, which had been first noted at 9 revolutions per minute, had increased to 10, and the screw, which had been previously counted at 22, rose to 29 and 30, and later in the evening to 32. The Race-Light was passed at 9:33, and the Eddystone at 11:30, the speed of the vessel being now, as per log, 13 knots, which, from considerations of safety, was rather lessened than increased during the remainder of the night. About 2 o'clock in the morning an incident occurred which was very nearly being attended with serious, if not fatal consequences. The lookout at the bows announced a light ahead on the starboard bow, but the man whose duty it was to [illegible] the word on from him to the officer of the watch carelessly sang out, "Light on the port bow." Of course it was known that from the course the ship was steering the only lights that could be seen must be that of some vessel making an in the contrary direction, and the order was immediately given to put up the helm, so as to avoid her. Luckily a gentleman on deck detected the error, and at once communicated it to the officer who was pacing on the signals to the men at the wheel. The necessary order was instantly given, and the helm was put hard up on the other side, but only in just sufficient time, the vessel, which proved to be a schooner in full sail, passing the big ship within less than a pistol shot. At daybreak on Sunday morning the Land's End was passed, and at half-past 6 A. M., the Bishop's Light, Scilly, after which, during the whole of Sunday, until towards evening, no land was visible.

A few hours before daybreak on Sunday morning the Great Eastern gave the first indication of being influenced by the motion of the waves. Hitherto there had been not the slightest motion either in the form of pitching or rolling, but about the time she passed the Lizard, those who had retired to their berths—which of course included all the non-nautical—were aroused from their sleep by a sensible oscillation, which required in some instances holding on in order to hold in, and, more or less, from this time until very near the end of the voyage the motion of the ship informed those whom she was carrying that she was not exactly a portion of terra firma, but could roll and pitch if necessary, according to the varying circumstances of wind and waves; the motion, however, although sufficient to occasion discomfiture to quite as many or two cases, was invariably considerably less than the largest ships we had been afloat in before, and in some greatest when the ships was being "put about" or when meeting cross currents and heavy seas. It is scarcely necessary to add, that her steadiness sailing is against the wind, and that her unsteadiness is with the wind at right angles to her course. The first experiment of using sails and steam together was tried. First, the staysail was set on the foremast of the six masts, or, as it is now christened, the staysail mast; then followed the unreefing of the trysails, and subsequently the trysails were set in succession upon four of the other masts, viz., the foremast, the mizzenmast, the mizen, and the jigger, or sternmost mast. As regards speed the effect was negatory, which is sufficiently accounted for by the fact that the wind, which was blowing fresh, as it had been all the morning, was direct upon the starboard beam; but in steering the vessel, and putting a stop to the rolling motion, the result was not only satisfactory, but instantaneous. Probably, in an artistic sense, the best aspect the vessel presents is the view from stem to stern when all her sails are set. Last Sunday there was too much wind to allow the topsails to be unfurled; but to the spectator standing at the stern of the ship, and looking along the capacious deck towards the bows, the vista of taut rigging, with the six tall, towering masts standing in line, their cancelous sails succeeding each other in the most exact and symmetrical regularity and bellying out with the breeze, was something beautiful. Unfortunately, no opportunity was afforded of seeing the action of the sails in adding to the motive power, the wind being during the whole of the rest of the voyage, unfavorable, and mostly directly against the vessel's course. The coast of Ireland was first sighted at about 4 o'clock on Sunday afternoon, and the whole run from the Bill at Portland to the Old Head of Kinsale, a distance of 300 nautical or 350 statute miles, was made, under the circumstances of wind and weather already described—the screw and paddle engines working together, but at far less than full pressure, the speed having been purposely kept down during the night—at 14 knots, or at an average speed of about 13 knots. The best rate of speed was attained during the last five hours of this portion of the voyage, in the course of which 73¾ knots were run over, giving an average rate per hour for that period of a fraction over 14½. In accomplishing this rate of speed the revolution of the paddle-wheels increased to 11 per minute, and of the screw to an average, according to Mr. Blaxx, of 42 per minute. It was intended that the test should include a trial not only of the two different classes of engines working in unison, with and without the sails, but of each engine separately, assisted and aided by the sailing power; but some misunderstanding or difference between the engineers and the sailing captain, or between the engineers and the managing directors, upon the subject of liability, prevented this. Both Mr. Russell and Mr. Blaxx it is said, objected to disconnect their engines when requested to do so, on the ground that both paddle and screw were intended to work together and not separately, and the consequence of the objection was that the opportunity of carrying out experiments which, if successful, would unquestionably increase the confidence of the public in the ship, was for the moment lost. Towards evening those who conducted the working of the screw engines intimated their desire to the trial; but no affirmative answer from Mr. Scott Russell having been made to a formal application made to him, the helm was put about and the ship was steered up St. George's Channel in the direction of Holyhead, her speed being purposely lowered to from 10 to 12 knots. Sunday night and Monday forenoon were marked by a strong gale from the northeast, accompanied by rain and mist, which indeed her captain to stand out in mid-channel. Here an opportunity was afforded of ascertaining the behavior of the ship in what sailors would call "dirty weather," and most creditably to herself did she come out of the trial. Though exposed to a sea which compelled smaller vessels to exhibit a reasonable proportion of their keels, the motion on board the Great Eastern was scarcely more than perceptible, there being no difficulty in walking the deck at any period; though it is [illegible] to add that the wind sent her at her favorite [illegible] ahead. While waiting for better weather, Capt. Harrison thought the occasion a favorable one for testing the docility of his charge in answering to her helm. This was done by turning her round, as it were, upon her own axis; the result, as timed by her commander, being that the complete rotary motion was accomplished within fourteen minutes. Continuing up Channel at an easy rate, land was again observed at about noon, and shortly afterwards the bold outline of Holyhead was recognized.

The weather had now moderated, and the engineers having yielded to the arguments of their friends—that the trial would be entirely incomplete if it supplied no means of judging how far either of the engines was capable of performing the work of propulsion if apart from itself through any accident by which the other might be disabled—so much of the experiments which had been set down as part of the previous day's programme as to the relative powers of the screw and the paddle-engines were tried. Of course the screw had the advantage, but from the difference in the calculations of the rival manufacturers it was difficult to collect the details with anything like certainty. Speaking generally and in round numbers, it may be said that the result showed a superiority of propelling power in the screw as compared with the paddles in the proportion of 9 knots an hour as against 7½. Mr. Russell's account is that the paddles drove the ship at the rate of 7¼ to 8 knots an hour with the screw fixed and dragging in the water, and at the rate of 4 knots an hour when the screw is left loose and allowed to revolve by the action of the water, in which latter statement it should be remembered the resistance of the screw propeller is included. The following is the official statement, which will be read with interest:

[illegible] the paddle-wheels [illegible] 11 or 11½ knots an hour was accomplished by their engines; and with the paddles fixed and allowing a surface of resistance equal to a diameter of [illegible] feet, the screw engines [illegible] 7 knots an hour. The screw engines [illegible] 9 knots an hour, and the paddle engines [illegible] 7¼ knots an hour. The screw engines [illegible] 8 knots an hour, and the paddle engines [illegible] 4 knots an hour. The screw engines [illegible] 9 knots an hour, and the paddle engines [illegible] 7¼ knots an hour. The screw engines [illegible] 8 knots an hour, and the paddle engines [illegible] 4 knots an hour.

Wreck of a Propeller on Lake Huron.
DREADFUL LOSS OF HUMAN LIVES.
From the Detroit Free Press, Oct. 22.

When telegraph lines already brought the brief announcement of the loss of the propeller Troy on Lake Huron, and the almost miraculous escape of three of the crew, the only survivors of the fearful catastrophe. There were twenty-six persons in all aboard the vessel at the time she foundered; all of whom, so far as we now know, with the exception of the first mate, wheelsman and second engineer, were lost. These three were saved by taking to a yawl that was consigned unseaworthy, and in which they were driven, by the force of the gale, across the lake, landing near Cheviich, Canada. The company on board consisted of twenty-six persons, of whom eight were passengers. So far as known, their names were as follows: Passengers—Mr. Baiem, of Racine, his wife and three children; a lady, name unknown, the sister of the Captain's wife; two steerage passengers, names unknown, making eight passengers.

Crew, Captain — Byron, of Racine. First Mate—Spencer Lewis, of Chicago. Second Mate—Jim, a negro residing in Buffalo. Last seen at Chicago. First Wheelsman—George F. Pr—ainley, of Detroit. Seventh Wheelsman—Name unknown, a Pole. Engineer—Joseph Kelly, of Chicago. Second Engineer—J. C. Barker, of Chicago. Cook—Tom, of Racine. Chambermaid—Elizabeth Leonard, of Chicago.

Besides the above there were six negro deck-hands, two firemen and one porter, making 15 in all of the crew.

In the consternation incident to the moment the quarter-boat was launched contrary to orders, into which a number of the crew sprang, overloading it and swamping it. The life-boat was then launched, and the party apportioned to it safely aboard, when the propeller giving indications of immediately sinking, a plank was made that experienced the boat, and she was nearly swamped when the Captain threw a portion of the crew back. In the rush, however, the yawl were lost, and the boat was left at the mercy of the waves. When last seen she was laying broadside to the sea, and probably could not carry her load a great while.
